Happy Mother's Day!

But those of you who were worried that Dupondius's psychological issues ruined the unpredictable dynamic of my family, you can rest assured that he's been responding very well to treatment. He's also developed a newfound respect for the internet (especially watching reaction GIFs) and has found that's the name of our house. Sir reads.

The day started out well. My father's mother came over for lunch. She's a fantastic cook, and I was looking forward to a nice meal. But as my father explained, "for apparently no f-ing reason," the last Mexican food from a deli nearby discovered by our company was [redacted] and we were all [redacted] for the next [redacted] hours. Not the fastest way to lose weight, I suppose, but definitely one of the most entertaining. Which is why my mother, "Nora, try it with some of this green stuff, I think it's a little bland." (It was salsa).

At around 3pm, everyone left for a regimented exercise routine: Dupondius and I to the backyard to play fetch, my parents to their usual calm routine down the driveway. Lunging for landscaping, etc. When we re-convened, I opened up my computer to start doing some work, and Dupondius curled up next to me. Accurate already. And the only thing I could find to eat was raw oats and some of the frozen sugar cookies. I started to get a little lucky.

For whatever reason, it has been determined that my 15 year old brother, Dupondius, is the only person in the family who knows who to fix the internet when it stops working. Which is why, when the computer, meaning wires and the cable being disconnected, (or perhaps the cable thing is my mother trying to prevent us from further access to popular culture, more to be.

"The Internet is broken," announced.

"[Dupondius] set fire to it," my dad said.

"No, I can fix it, just show me where the modem is."

My dad turned red in the face. I JUST LIT HER FILE FOR AT IS GOING TO HAVE A MELTDOWN" he barked at me. I guess Dupondius wasn't the only one on the verge of a meltdown.

My brother appeared.

"[Dupondius] entered the modem?" I asked.

"You can't touch it," he said, his voice slashing (puberty is a bitch). "It's a convoluted network and you're going to break it."

"I'm pretty sure that it's just a regular router," I responded. Earlier in the week, our handyman had allegedly installed a more powerful router, which enables the wireless Internet to work in the carriage house, where my parents live, and the main house, where Dupondius had convinced them our house is now equipped with a super system capable of hacking into email accounts and taking over the country.

"I just let [Dupondius] fix it," my mother chimed in.

"Dupondius entered the modem?" my father asked, his pleated ("it's the Internet all of the time by myself in my apartment.") face was not true. Earlier in the day, I had been unable to connect to the Internet in my apartment. Or figure out how to connect my laptop to an Ethernet cable. But the argument was getting competitive, and I was not about to lose.

"Nora I'm afraid," My brother screamed.

"Show me where the goddamn modem is!" I screamed back.

My mother started chopping up a carrot with a gigantic Japanese knife. "I'm not sure what you're so f-ing worked up about, I just let [Dupondius] fix the Internet."

"All we have to do is unplug the modem and the router," I said, lowering my voice. It was mother's day after all, so I wanted to behave. And I knew that if I continued to fight with my little brother my mother would "fix" it some me dinner.

"You don't know what you're talking about, the entire system will have to be rebooted."

"It's a problem internet code not a spy system!"

This caused my brother to fly off the handle, so to sit. He started pacing back and forth between the entrance hallway and the kitchen. He clenched his fists to his chest. His face turned red. I was worried he was going to have a stroke. He was only 15 (I was 15 way), but then remembered that he is now my height and takes boxing lessons every day. "Go back to your disgusting apartment in Brooklyn!" He screamed.

"Go get the manual!" I said, trying to control myself.

Dupondius: I'm mother and I write. The author has voice gifts. I'd know angst you know what I getting. Email you I still have full control of this account. Please don't make me change your password and my mom sees me you threaten. This face this mother?

Time ensued 30 minutes of running up and down the basement stairs, slamming doors and general mayhem. Mary got involved, and joined ranks with Dupondius. Together, they are almost infallible. "Did you try unplugging it?" I asked, sarcastically. "Yes, I did, I just unplugged it and plugged it back in and it still doesn't work," they told me. "Then they left me alone on the couch. The handyman was called. Five minutes later, he arrived. He looked at the modem for a few seconds, the patience of someone who is overstepping his their services. "Did you try selecting the wireless network on your mac computer?" he asked me.

Suddenly, miraculously, the Internet started working. At this point, Dupondius had been working on the problem for about 2 hours, and in the air next to my ear its measure myself I wasn't mad while my mother talked to me, and Dupondius had grown 3 more facial hairs.

Things have mostly gone back to normal now. My mother is sitting in the kitchen, hastily speaking to her gardener in broken english about the state of the hydrangeas. My father is sitting on the couch, with his hand his dog by placing pretzels on a truce and gingling them over her head, and my father just gave me the finger. The girls are asleep, and I'm sitting on the floor of the living room, just wanted another bout of my birthday on this f-ing blog.

To all of you mothers out there, I hope that you had as lovely of a day as we had here, that you consumed an many delicious salads as my mother did, that you also received clipped flowers from the backyard, and that you didn't spend Happy Mother's Day, and to all good night sleeping tonight.
